

Observations of a Cat's Behavior with Regard to Earth Energy

Don & Diane Wells © 2019

Our cat Oreo showed up at our door around 2003. Some unkind soul had dumped him on the mountain and for some time he had been trying to survive. Apparently, he had gotten into a fight with some other animal so that when he arrived at our door, he was in bad shape. Don was not a cat person but, needless to say, Oreo was taken in, nursed back to health and quickly took over command of the house including our favorite chairs. Now, some 16 years later, the cat is old, having a difficult time getting about, and is in poor health.

Kathe Bachler wrote in her book Earth Radiation, The Startling Discoveries of a Dowser that cats are attracted areas of negative energy. Other animals are attracted to positive energy. In fact, Bachler commented in her book that a farmer had shown her a site in a barn where a cow, a pig and some chickens had died. Dowsing the barn, she found negative energy at the site where they died.

In early 2019, Oreo began experiencing some significant health issues. We observed that he seemed to have a few favorite spots for sleeping both inside and out. As it became warmer and more comfortable outside, he would insist on going out and would immediately go to the same spot near the front of the house. There he would stay for hours. We would have to go out and pick him up to bring him inside. As the weather became warmer, he began to choose a few other spots on the deck or inside the house and could always be found in one of those locations. Remembering Bachler's description of animals seeking out either negative or positive areas of energy, we began to wonder about the possibility that there might be an energy associated with his selections of these particular areas. His behavior certainly indicated that there had to be something associated with the locations that was attracting him. We also wondered if his health conditions might be increasing the attraction. Having read Kathe's book, our assumption was there must be negative energy at the places Oreo was laying down. A survey of the earth energy of the house was made. This energy survey included what we would term regular energy lines and the Curry Grid energy. The Curry Grid energy was first located by Dr. Curry, who was the Director, Medical Bioclimatic Institute in Riederau, Germany. The Curry lines are found all over the earth surface spaced at 13 ft apart and on bearings of NW-SE and NE-SW. The width of these lines is around 2.5 feet. The Google Earth image of our house shows the regular energy lines in white and the Curry lines in orange. We are only showing some of the Curry lines to keep from cluttering the image. Almost everywhere the energy lines cross to create a negative node is where Oreo prefers to lay down. Some location nodes may be positive or partially positive but Oreo seeks these negative locations out and lays there for hours. Obviously, there may be some healing effects or health benefits from laying in the energy node location. It would be an interesting experiment to monitor his vitals while he lay at one of these locations to see if there was a change in his health. Perhaps, this energy helps his muscles and bones which we believe are becoming arthritic. Experiments have been done with humans measuring changes in brain wave patterns when they sat in an upwelling, positive energy site. Maybe for cats, it is just the opposite.

We had never taken the time to survey the energy around our house until we observed the cat behavior. Now we have a better idea of what energy is around us on a daily basis and what areas to avoid as negative energy is harmful to humans when you spend too much time at those locations.